Life and Times of Philanthropist Eliza Sutton (1806-1889), Founder of the Eben Dale Sutton Reference Library of the Peabody Institute

Delivered in the Eben Dale Sutton Room to commemorate Women's History Month, March 1, 1998

One of the most fascinating things about local history is the unique quality of learning experience that it offers. Local history learning experiences are different because they allow us to share the same physical space at a different point in time. It is spaces like the Eben Dale Sutton Reference Room that directly connect us to our roots and heritage. We share this space with the people and events that have been here, and this room has been host to some great minds.

Speakers who were the featured guests of the Institute's Lyceum would have surely wanted to browse this priceless collection. People like Ralph Waldo Emerson, Louis Aggasiz, Oliver Wendell Holmes, John Greenleaf Whittier, Major General Grenville Dodge, and countless others, including Charles Upham, who came here to research his book on Salem Witchcraft.

George Peabody¹ also enjoyed this room. It's likely that Eliza Sutton accompanied him here in the summer of 1869, on the occasion of his last visit to the town. It was in this room that Mr. Peabody and visiting distinguished gentlemen "gave their autographs to the register" – in other words, they applied for a library card.²

Before Peabody went to the dedication ceremony for the Peabody Institute in Danvers, there was a grand reception held for visiting dignitaries who had been brought from Boston on a special run of the Eastern Railroad.

George Peabody was a significant role model for Eliza Sutton. Although neither were born into great wealth, they both became wealthy philanthropists who funded educational institutions and ~~they~~ were both involved in providing housing for poor people. They were raised at a time when charity and the giving of alms were regarded as a virtue.³

Peabody's first major philanthropic gift was to create the Peabody Institute on Main Street, which he followed with numerous other gifts, including millions of dollars to build housing for the poor of London.

Eliza Sutton funded and furnished the Eben Dale Sutton Reference Room and was active in creating housing for elderly, destitute women in Peabody.

She and her future husband, Eben⁴, were raised in the same neighborhood and with the same influences that a young George Peabody experienced. They grew up in the shadow of the witch hollows of Salem and the revolutionary fervor of Danvers. They were part of the dawning of an enlightened, tolerant and cosmopolitan culture that was in pursuit of moral justice.

George Peabody was ~~seven~~ years old when Eliza was born on April 11, 1806. She was the eldest of two children born to Elizabeth Osborn and Jonathan Dustin. Her father built and operated the Dustin Hotel, which was sometimes referred to as the Sun Tavern.⁵

When this trio was young, the scandal and romance of Eliza Wharton and the Bell Tavern was fresh on the minds of the villagers and the heroes of the Revolution were common place citizens who gathered on 'lection day or visited the square in the spring to scoop barrels full of alewives that teemed in the North River and in Gideon Foster's mill pond.

They all were children when the South Danvers Female Benevolent Society, which is sometimes also referred to as the Ladies Benevolent Society, was formed during the deep economic depression of 1814. Peabody was then a large country village of about two thousand people known as southern Danvers. The object of the Society was not general charity, but rather "to provide suitable articles of clothing for those who are unable to provide for themselves."⁶

George Peabody's poor family may have been a recipient of the group's charity. Their first action was to spend money to purchase cotton cloth to make one pair of sheets and pillowcases for loan to needy families in the case of sickness. At the seventy-fifth anniversary of the group, Eliza Sutton attended and was introduced as one of their aged and long-standing members.

The group is active in Peabody, a hundred and eighty-three years later. In 1998, the group is now an extension of benevolent societies of all Protestant churches. It does not receive too many requests for aid since there are now modern social programs in place to help the poor. The most recent gifts of the group have involved aiding in the payment of fuel and rent bills.

Eliza attended the Saugus Female Seminary, and, in 1822, at the age of sixteen, she was a member of the Danvers Literary Circle, which met regularly on Main Street to discuss various heady topics. It was a forerunner to the Institute's Lyceum and among the members was a young lawyer, Rufus Choate⁷, who had just opened an office on Main Street.

She was twenty-one years old when she married Eben Sutton, a wealthy owner of several textile mills in North Andover. The Suttons were very active in the establishment of the town's first Unitarian Church. Eliza is listed in 1832 as a member of the Ladies Unitarian Society⁸, which organized the social gatherings of the church, such as an outing to pick blueberries at the King's farm at Crystal Lake in West Peabody. They also raised funds to purchase an organ for the church.

On the sixtieth anniversary of the Battle of Lexington in 1835, the Suttons were likely part of the long procession that followed the cobblestone path on Main Street to the gateway of the Old South Burial Ground. Once assembled, they listened as the piercing sound of three volleys of musketry rang out in the silence over the graves of the local heroes. The procession counter-marched to the site of the monument, which was then at the corner of Main and Washington Streets, and General Gideon Foster, the town's oldest surviving soldier of the Revolution, placed a time capsule in the monument's cornerstone. Included in the box of documents, was an extensive history of the Ladies Benevolent Society.⁹

The Sutton's first son died as an infant on August 24, 1839. Eliza, who was then thirty-three years old, had been married for more than ten years. Nearly a decade later, when she was forty-two years old, she had a second son, Eben Dale. He was born with a "crippling and painful infirmity" that confined him to a wheelchair.

In June, 1852, the Suttons were also probably crowded with twelve hundred other people for a sit-down meal in a tent set up off Crowninshield Street. They were gathered on that oppressively hot afternoon to celebrate the town's one hundred year separation from Salem and it was also the occasion of the announcement of George Peabody's gift for the library.¹⁰

From Gleason's Pictorial

When crowds lined up along Main Street in August 1853 on another warm and sunny day, it was to lay the cornerstone of the Peabody Institute. A raised platform was erected and Felton's Band provided music. The great industrialist Abbot Lawrence spoke and placed the cornerstone at the northwest corner of the building, saying, "I trust the institution may be as permanent as the granite of which it is composed."

Since the library was not yet constructed, the social festivities of the event were conducted at the Sutton family estate¹¹ on Aborn Street that was adorned with European linden trees, a curved stairway and glass door knobs shaped like pineapples. This was the home of Eben's brother, General William Sutton, who also operated a wool-pulling mill on Main Street.

When the library opened in September 1854, the Suttons were surely among the hundreds who gained admission to the hall and lecture room. Statesman Rufus Choate gave an eloquent, seventy-minute long, keynote address, despite being severely ill. He spoke on "the true idea and office of the lecture in connection with the library". A painting of George Peabody by Healy that had been ordered by the citizens of Danvers arrived from Europe in time to be placed over the rostrum of the new lecture hall.

Construction was also taking place at that time across the street from the library. Eben Sutton's new estate was laid out and a house built around 1854 at the corner of Main and Park streets. It was a large, brick house with a stable in the rear that featured beautiful grounds in the summer time and a large bronze fountain in the center of a spacious lawn.

Eben and Eliza decorated the house in 1856 for the grand parade and reception honoring George Peabody, who was their houseguest during his visit. A banner on the home read "Welcome to our guest" and a pyramidal bower of flags and bunting was placed at the front of the house. The next day, U.S. statesman and Sutton family friend, Edward Everett¹² stood on the Sutton's portico to witness the elaborate procession.

George Peabody stayed with the Suttons on Main Street in October 1856

Following the parade, there was an Evening Levee in the lecture hall on the upper story of the Institute and when the evening drew to a close, Mr. Peabody retired to a second levee, and then to a third which was held at the Sutton's mansion.¹³

Eliza and Eben probably sat next to George Peabody when he returned to South Danvers in the fall of 1857 and attended a picnic in King's Grove in the area of Lowell and Forest streets. He and his friends were seated near the head of the center table. All eighteen tables that were set up in the meadow were covered with white cloth from the Danvers Bleachery. The Boston Brigade Band played and when Peabody left the field, he was headed for the Sutton mansion, which was hospitably thrown open to the public in the evening.¹⁴

The Suttons were also friendly with Fitch Poole, who was their neighbor, the Institute librarian, and a friend of George Peabody, editor of the local weekly newspaper and a well-known practical joker. In July 1858, Eben Sutton gave Poole a free vacation and tickets to visit the White Mountains of New Hampshire. Later that year, it is likely that Eben and Eliza accepted Poole's invitation to a party that he held at his home on Main Street following a series of lectures at the Institute by a geologist named Professor Hitchcock.

About forty persons attended Poole's party on December first. He had planned the event for months. As the guests arrived, they passed by a room where a large table was laden with delicious looking food. When the time for refreshments arrived, the company was ushered into the well-supplied supper room, while Poole excused himself from the room in order to observe his guests.

He reported that "after the first descent upon the table, a strange embarrassment stole over those who endeavored to dispense the refreshments. One would take the cover from a dish, and hastily replace it; another found the oysters a surprising weight and texture; the cake could scarcely be lifted; the ice creams and custards could be carried about bodily by the spoons inserted in them; each new dish was more puzzling than the last. At length, it dawned upon the brighter spirits, that here was a truly geological feast and the laughter began. The oysters were pudding-stone; the cake was brick, frosted with plaster of Paris; custards and creams were plaster colored and molded; sugar, cream, and every detail of the banquet was of mineral origin, or plaster, or stone, or clay.” When the fun began to subside, the Pooles threw open another door and presented their guests with a more edible menu.¹⁵

Eben Sutton

Eben Sutton’s greatest success came in the years before and after the outbreak of the Civil War. In 1860, he contributed to the fund to build a bronze Minute Man monument to be erected at Battery Grove at Lexington.¹⁶ His patriotic sentiments were also evident when the town was faced with paying bounties for local military recruits. Eben offered to loan the town the sum of $12,000 for one year at a semi-annual interest rate of six and on-half percent in order to pay the recruits.¹⁷

In 1861, the largest real estate transfer in the vicinity in many years occurred when Eben purchased all of the mills in North Andover then owned by a “Gen. Hodges”.¹⁸ Eben was also managing the Pemberton Company mill in Lawrence at this time.¹⁹

The Suttons probably also had something to do with the creation of Sutton Hall, a “commodious assembly hall near the Institute”, that was dedicated in 1860 and was the site of many socials, firemen’s assemblies, a leap year party, a May Day breakfast and fair, as well as many other events.

Support for the war effort must have been contagious at the Sutton home, because Eben Dale, who was then a teenager, was reported to have organized a home brigade of young boys and exempts to protect South Danvers from rebel invasion. This group, led by Eben Dale in his wheelchair, drilled on the streets about the square.

No doubt Eliza Sutton was among the “patriotic ladies of South Danvers” who announced measures for making garments for soldiers on April 24, 1861 - twelve days after the first guns of Fort Sumter were fired. A month later, they gathered at Sutton Hall to utilize eight sewing machines that had been set up. They solicited materials and fashioned one hundred and thirty flannel shirts, one hundred and twenty pairs of drawers, and made bandages sufficient for a regiment.²⁰

By July, the Ladies Benevolent Society, which was too busy with work for the soldiers to meet regularly, continued to distribute local charity and advertised the need for second hand clothing to meet numerous applications for aid by local townspeople, who were again experiencing an economic depression due to war.²¹

Donations were stored in Sutton Hall and there were many fast and furious knitting parties to create stockings, mittens and scarves that were sent to members of the town serving in the 14th regiment and elsewhere.²² Knitting was a very popular past time. There was an anonymous poem printed in the newspaper called "Lines Addressed to a Stocking Knit for the Soldiers"²³ and local retailers wisely advertised gold-eyed knitting needles for sale.²⁴

A humorous article was published about a group of local brave, knitters called "The Blue Stocking Zouaves". It referred to the "clash of 'northern steel' " that occurred at the drill meetings of the knitters' brigade which met on Franklin, Washington and Holten streets.²⁵

As the calendar turned to 1862, the newspaper published a list of items needed in hospitals near Washington D.C. and announced a relationship that had been formed between the local Ladies Aid Society and Mrs. Joseph T. Fales of the India Hospital. Throughout the year, local people donated items to Fales. The relationship must have been a fond one because Fales visited the town in mid-November.

Tragedy struck the Suttons about that time when Eben Dale died suddenly and accidentally at the age of fifteen. The South Danvers Wizard reported, "Nearly everyone one knew the severe trials of his young life, the remarkable fortitude with which he endured suffering and pain, and how with patience and hope he rose above bodily infirmities, and illustrated the heroism of a brave soul. Almost daily he was seen upon the street, riding in his carriage, or wheeling himself along in his chair, taking quick notice of everything which transpired, and greeting all he met with a pleasant word and a winning smile."

He was described as "vivacious and sprightly" with "an active and inquiring mind cultivated much beyond his years"²⁶ A long anonymous, poem eulogizing Eben Dale appeared on the front page of the South Danvers Wizard in January of 1863.²⁷

A year later, Eliza suffered another loss, when, after visiting with neighbors, Eben was seized with a sharp pain. He fell asleep and died almost instantly.²⁸ In his obituary, he was described as "a man of strongly marked character, extensively and successfully engaged in business and well known in all the centers of trade in the state.

At the time of his death, he had been the President of the Danvers Bank for thirteen years. He was also a member of the first board of Trustees of the Peabody Institute and for six years he served as the Institute's treasurer. He was also a Director and President of the Eastern Railroad for many years. He was always a firm and decided Democrat in his politics, and was a one-time candidate for State Senator.

"In his social relations, he was pleasant and playful, and had a ready word and smile for all whom he met. Like most men of strong points of character, and who have devoted their lives to acclamation, he had his peculiarities. He had his liberal moods, his likes and dislikes, and when he bestowed of his abundant wealth, which he often did largely, but privately, he would do it in his own mode and not at the suggestion of others. He was a man of strong attachments, and where he gave his confidence he gave it fully and unhesitatingly and did not withdraw it without sufficient cause."²⁹

With the passing of her son and husband, Eliza withdrew from social commitments during the remainder of the war and it was 1866 before she became active in the community again. In October, she wrote to the Trustees of the Peabody Institute stating her desire to make an offering to the Institute as a memorial to her son. She reported that she had received the approval of George Peabody and offered a sum of $20,000.³⁰

When George Peabody arrived by the Lowell train in October 1866, Eliza entertained him at her residence.³¹ October 15 was a day of surprises for the people of the town. In the morning, George Peabody met with hundreds of school children in the library's great hall and arranged to surprise them with a gift.

Hanging over the center of the stage was the familiar portrait of Peabody by Healy, but it was covered with a veil. One of the Trustees told the children that "some earthly or fairy hand had transformed the picture that the children were accustomed to see there", and when he removed the veil, he revealed a new, full-length portrait of George Peabody.³²

After the children left, there was another reception for adults and another surprise gift was announced. It was reported that the announcement of this new gift "fell upon the audience like a thunder clap from a clear sky."

George Peabody said, "I am now entrusted with a communication from a lady of this town, to the trustees of the Institute, which more especially concerns you, the older population of this, my native town, which I shall read to you, with a degree of pleasure and satisfaction which can only be equaled by that felt by yourselves, who are, with your descendants and successors, to be benefited by her great and considerate munificence. From her high character and well known wealth and liberality, you will doubtless anticipate the name of Mrs. Eben Sutton."³³

The fact that Peabody made the announcement of Sutton's gift added a touch of class to the occasion. Remarks were made that Sutton's gift put an admirable finish to the substantial kindness of George Peabody, and that it was fitting that the Institute's "last stroke of beauty" was to be added by a woman's hand.

Children's Reception 1866

The South Danvers Wizard editorialized that Eliza Sutton's gift was a "natural but surprising" thing. "Look at its history. A young lad lived in the immediate neighborhood of the Institute, precocious, but encompassed with bodily infirmity. He had an inquisitive mind and a taste for art, science and mechanics. He is also an amateur artist and a lover of the natural sciences. These tastes he is enabled to indulge through the advantages of the Peabody Institute. In the midst of his investigations, and when the hopes of his parents ran the highest, he is suddenly cut down by a fatal accident. He is an only child and in a material sense was one of our large expectations.....This gift comes from a family intimately acquainted with the working of the Institute. No household in town has tested it more thoroughly, or enjoyed its privileges more continuously..."³⁴

There is a correlation between the announcement of Eliza's philanthropic gifts and the visits of George Peabody. It's likely that Eliza attended the fiftieth wedding anniversary celebration in December 1866 of Henry and Eunice Cook, which was also attended by George Peabody, who was then visiting the United States for a period of several months.³⁵

Eunice Cook was a young member, with Eliza, of the Danvers Literary Circle and also an early and active member of the Female Benevolent Society. The members of the society presented Cook with the gift of a large, silver pitcher on the occasion of her anniversary.

In response, Cook suggested that the Benevolent Society increase their funds, "until we can follow the example of our noble benefactor, George Peabody, and provide houses at a low rent for the poor of South Danvers."³⁶

Two months later in February 1867, at the time of his great gift to establish the Southern Education Fund, George Peabody met with President Andrew Johnson. He then traveled north to surprise his friends who annually celebrated his birthday and to attend the first annual reunion of the Peabody High School Association. It is likely he also attended the Benevolent Society Levee that was held that same week.

At the Valentines Day levee, a letter was read announcing that Eliza Sutton and Mary Upton had each pledged $1,000 to fund "suitable homes or houses for elderly women of American parentage of this town who are in destitute circumstances, where they can be made comfortable and happy in their declining years."³⁷

It's possible that Eliza's partner in this endeavor was Mary Upton Ferrin, the earliest Massachusetts pioneer of woman suffrage who advocated on behalf of married women's property rights after hers were threatened by her alcoholic and abusive husband. Part of Ferrin's activism involved documenting cases of abuse in Essex County and one year, her annual petition to the state legislature featured only signatures of women over the age of sixty.

Since Ferrin lived then on Lowell Street with her Uncle Eben Upton and his wife, Mary King Upton, it is possible that Sutton's partner was Mary King Upton, a wealthy woman who no doubt was heavily influenced by the causes of her niece and house mate Mary Upton Ferrin.³⁸

For the next two years, Eliza was busy with her efforts for the Charitable Tenement Association, which was incorporated in April 1869. She was also busy furnishing the Eben Dale Sutton Reference Room. It opened on June 7, 1869 at an expense of $13,000, which was provided by Eliza in addition to the $20,000 donation that she had made previously.

The reference library was described in 1869 "as one of the finest rooms in the country". The ceiling is a piece of fresco work, with ornamental decorations and an elaborate cornice. Three sides of the room are finished in solid black walnut bookshelves with plate glass doors. The shelving extends around the room to a height of eighteen feet and the tall ceiling is graced with a center chandelier and side brackets of a massive pattern in bronze.³⁹

The library can accommodate twelve thousand volumes and the alcoves were arranged so that an abundance of light would be let into the room from three sides. Below the shelving, are drawers with a patented attachment that prevents them from sagging even when drawn out to their full length.

The remaining wall was finished to represent heavy drapery as a background for Eben Dale's portrait, which was painted by A. Hartwell of Boston and framed in gilt with an elaborately carved outer frame of black walnut. The furniture is also made of black walnut and upholstered in maroon colored velvet, which contrasted nicely with the colors in a Brussels carpet that covered the floor.⁴⁰

After the room was opened, it was further adorned by two brass statuettes that were placed on the tables as portable gas burners. The figurines were said to represent Boston and New York.⁴¹

The selection of books for the reference library was handled by Ezra Abbott of Cambridge, although Eliza personally donated books to the collection, including: Lord Kingsborough's nine volume work on "Mexican Antiquities", and a three volume collection of the "Master Pieces of Industrial Art and Sculpture".⁴² She also presented the library with nineteen volumes of engravings and texts of the Historical Gallery of Versailles, France.⁴³

In February 1870, when George Peabody's body lay in state in the Peabody Institute, many notable people attending his funeral were entertained by the Suttons, including Prince Arthur of England, Edwin Thornton, British Minister to Admiral David Farragut, Governor Claflin of Massachusetts and Maine Governor Joshua Chamberlain, who was a hero of the War of the Rebellion.

Shortly after the reference library was completed, Eliza purchased a farm in Centre Harbor, Maine where she regularly spent the summer. During the winter, when she returned to Peabody, she remained active with the L.B.S. and the Charitable Benevolent Association, which built a house on Oak Street and held a levee on New Year's Eve 1871 to raise funds for their work.

Eliza presented her mansion on Main Street as a gift to her niece, Serena Ayer Pevear, on Christmas Day, 1887. She then began residing with another niece, Eliza D. Clement, at her home on Park Street.

Eliza Sutton died in August 1889. Her funeral services were largely attended and were conducted by Rev. Hudson of the Unitarian Church, who was assisted by Rev. Edward Everett Hale of Boston, who had been a friend of Eliza's for many years.

Her obituary reads, "Mrs. Sutton will be missed, probably, more than any other person in town, and while this may be a stereotyped expression, in this case, it means everything that the words imply..."

"The wealth which came to her was not a temptation, as it would have been to many, but in helping where help was needed....she maintained a character which was unusual in a woman of her circumstances without losing a particle of that true womanhood which endeared her to so many friends."

The provisions of her will, which included numerous public bequests, were detailed in a lengthy, front-page newspaper article in August 1889.⁴⁴ The newspaper reported, "The only bequest that causes surprise to any extent is the desire that the Old Ladies' Home in accepting a gift of $5,000, shall take the name of the Sutton House, it being generally understood that Mrs. Sutton was averse to any such notoriety."

Two years later, there was renewed interest within the community in the Charitable Tenement Association and funds were raised. The house on Oak Street was sold in 1885 and the General William Sutton mansion on Aborn Street became the new residence of the Sutton Home for Aged Women.

Hundreds of people visited the institution when it opened in November 1890. The keynote speaker said, "The Old Ladies Home, long a cherished hope, is now a reality. The years of faithful service are crowned with a rich reward. Peabody may well be proud of the spirit of charity and benevolence that has founded in her midst, this home of comfort and beauty for the aged. The position of women in the world has always marked the moral condition of mankind."⁴⁵

That sentiment must have guided Eliza Sutton when she distributed her estate of more than $400,000. She bequeathed a permanent trust fund to the Town of Peabody, the annual income of which was to be used to purchase and distribute food for Thanksgiving Day to deserving poor people of her neighborhood in the area of Park Street. In 1909, the local newspaper reported that sixty-four Thanksgiving dinners were supplied with income from the funds.⁴⁶ In 1997, the fund was still providing meals.

She also gave $5,000 to the Eben Dale Sutton fund to be permanently invested and the income expended for books for the library. She gave another $5,000, the interest on which was to be used to furnish lights, fuel, carpets and furniture for this room and another $5000 was bequeathed as an investment in a building fund.

To the local Unitarian Society, she left $10,000, half of which was earmarked for the repair of their organ. Additionally, $10,000 was given to the American Unitarian Association for its unconditional use and another $200 to the Unitarian Sunday School Society of Boston.

Eliza left $1500 each to the local Ladies Unitarian Society and the Ladies Benevolent Society. The Children's Mission for the Children of the Destitute of Boston received $2000 from Eliza.

She left $1000 each to: the Consumptive Home, the Women and Children's Hospital, the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Young Men's Christian Union of Boston, the Massachusetts Deaf Mute Christian Union of Boston, and the General Theological Library of Boston.

A $500 bequest was made to the Home for Aged Colored Women of Boston and to the South Friendly Society associated with the South Congregational Church of Boston of which Edward Everett Hale was minister.

She left bequests to several family members, and also to Mrs. Eliza P. Stevens, who was the daughter of a Peabody man, Miles Osborn. Eliza Osborn was taken in by Mrs. Sutton as a child and brought up and educated by her, until the time of Osborn's marriage to Henry H. Stevens. Her niece, Eliza D. Clement, inherited her lands on Main and Park streets.

Eliza Sutton was remembered in her obituary as a "typical New England woman. The primitive customs, the frugality, and the labor that characterized them, were never lost sight of by her. While others would have remained idle, and been served, she preferred to work and serve herself. This accounted for her interest in industrial work of all kinds, and almost her last visit before she left her home for Centre Harbor, was to an exhibition of the children in sewing, in a school that had been prosecuting this work by her benefactions."⁴⁷

There were many floral offerings at her funeral, including a large pillow of ivy and white roses from the Ladies Unitarian Association, a large wreath from the Peabody Institute trustees, and from her brother-in-law Gen. William Sutton there were 83 roses and 4 rose buds, representing her age. She is buried in the family tomb in Harmony Grove cemetery.⁴⁸
